BY HON. J. M. NILES.

Delivered in the U. S. Senate in the winter of '38. forted thus:

MR. CLAY'S REMARKS. he(Mr.C.)should not be at all astonished if he ous. were to get up in his place and deny it, as he had before done the death of the sun-treasury. But, sir, the gentleman is dead (said Mr. C.) where his career, though short, was not less political death. brilliant and distinguished. When instrucions came from his own State, he had the remains; there let him rest "

MR. NILES'S REPLY. [Mr. Clay.] which I heard with surprise, as I It is as follows, short and simple: ad supposed that the account between him and myself was balanced, at least for the present session. He has, however, seen fit to egen it under circumstances somewhat unexnected, and it remains for me to endeavor to

Mr. N. said he owed the senator something more than an epitaph, and would honor him Orleans in February last. with a brief biographical notice of his public life. The honorable senator commenced his career early, and its dawn was illumined by hight hopes and noble aspirations. Like heraspirants for power, his early life was listinguished by an ardent love for the people, and strong professions of devotion to ponular rights. He was a democrat of full blood; a Jeffersonian democrat; a strict construction. ist; a believer in the right of instruction; friend of economy, and a mortal en-my of national bank and all aristocratic institutions He talked loudly and eloquently about the rights of the people and the rights of the States and denounced the federalists and all their

But notwithstanding all this zeal and lov for the people, it would seem that there wa at the bottom a little love for self; as we ar informed by a distinguished but eccentri statesman of the Old Dominion, now no more that the moment he entered the halls of Con gress he fixed his eyes upon a certain whit house in this city, which appears to have had a peculiar fascination on his mind. This ear ly sentiment soon became a ruling passion. and "grew with its growth, and strengthened with its strength." This supreme objet of the senator's ambition has been a sort of guisfituus, which has led him on from point to point, from one measure to another. through political bogs and quagmires; but i he has sometimes sunk into the mud, he has hitherto had the good formine to get out, anon his feet once more. The pursuit of his darling object has led him to mount, booted and spurred, numerous political hobbies; al of which he rode very hard, and all of which he rode down, without reaching the object of his pursuit. A high tariff, the American sys- JULY, on, internal improvements, and Bunk of the United States-all these have been rode dow and broken down; but the latter having th most bottom, the senator has mounted agai and is now riding as furiously, and with qui as sanguine hopes of success, as at first.

With his eyes steadily fixed on his object and never for a moment withdrawn, the sen or watched the progress of events, and waite rather impatiently the movements of the trou led waters of politics. The derangement parties in 1824, was thought to present a fa vorible opportunity. The senator entered up on the President's course with high hopes ar sanguine expectations. The result, however showed that vaulting ambition had overste ped the bounds of probability, as he was n only heaten but distanced, and driven off the course the first heat. But although beate himself, and thrown out, he was still place in a favorable position; and in regard to the lection in the House of Representatives wa generally supposed to have the game in h own hands. And here there is one point resemblance in the senator's life and my ow as he has described it. He says I have made an able argument against the right of instruction. If I have made an argument, he has done much more; he has furnished an example; and however the senator may regard his (Mr. N.'s) argument, he was very sensible that its weight and influence would be trifling compared with the conspicuous example of the senator. His State had instructed him to by John Bunting, Esq., the Rev. James L. But, not discouraged by these two defeats, the senator never for a moment abandoned his bject, but immediately commenced rallying his br ken and scattered forces all over the country for another contest. This came on in 1832, when he again took the field, aided by a powerful ally, the Bank of the United States, against the most heroic and powerful captain of the age. The conflict was tremen. his age. dous, although at no time doubtful. The senator and his bank allies were beaten, routed, and driven from the field with loss of bag and
